NorthBay

been retained by the students and to help the schools continue environmental education and other lessons from NorthBay.

NorthBay Facts

- The school program can accommodate 350 students per week.
- The students all eat together at large tables in the dining hall. Some students report they never eat at a table with their families at home. The program's focus on choices includes teaching the students how to make good food choices.
- When NorthBay opened, it was assumed that local students and other students from rural counties would have more knowledge of the Bay and woodlands. NorthBay personnel say this is not the case. About 70% of the youngsters, whether they are from rural or urban counties, have had very little or no practical environmental experiences.

• Even though there are a lot of people residing in the Upper Bay, there are few programs studying the bay. NorthBay students were the first to document the spread of invasive zebra mussels in local waters. NorthBay students also were the first to confirm the invasion of snakehead fish in the area.

• During their first decade of operations, NorthBay saw 207,468 students from 350 schools in 13 states.

• NorthBay has 145 employees with 97 of them working full time.

• Cecil County schools were the first to commit to send sixth graders to the program and NorthBay has a close relationship with county schools. NorthBay is working with local schools on the Cecil County Youth Leadership Program to help students learn how to help other students keep away from drugs.

• NorthBay has summer camp experiences, as well.

• With schools reporting how the lessons at NorthBay appear to positively impact the students for weeks after the program, a program known as NorthBay Extended or NEXT has been started with NorthBay personnel going to schools that have attended NorthBay to help start service learning, day trips, environment programs and how to encourage green schools.
